MOVING? Please use form inside paper and give full information. Mailing list is run on Friday following week.

Now that the Congressmen, Burrows & sundry Exports of one kind or other have decided that the Gas Boys are guilty of horrid natural gas and are responsible for the Shortage & prices of stuph of the kind for not producing every cubic foot of gas known to be in the ground we can expect villification to become rampant. It seems that some Exports reported to Secy. of Interior Andrus that some of the Oil & Gas Boys have offshore wells in the Gulf. They are agreeing to High Hedges that all of this gas was not put into the pipe lines to avert their recent unpleasantness in the Eastern parts of the country when King Winter lowered the boom. They seem to think the deep production & shallow production can be produced at the same time! They found that what production is (CONT. ON PAGE 12)

United States New Role in World Trade Opens New Problems on Vast Scale Concerning Imports, Exports

(Editor's Note: The following article printed in "Foreign Agriculture" outlines the thinking of new Secretary of Agriculture Bob Bergland, and since a new national farm program is under consideration in Congress at this time, his ideas and theories on imports, exports and production planning, food reserves, etc., are especially timely.)

As we look toward forming future farm and trade policy, there are two considerations that need a new level of attention:

- One of these is old—older than agriculture—as old as mankind. It is weather.
- The other is new—newer than television—newer than supersonic travel. It is global agriculture—a phenomenon that in this decade has thrust American farmers into a new international role.

More than price, more than market demand, more than human needs, the world's weather determines crop output in any given year. Governmental policies and the market influence total output and mix of production among commodities. Science and technology affect yield trends over the long haul. But in a given year, weather is the overriding factor.

I think the Department of Agriculture should make better use of weather data, utilizing these data in ways that are of maximum value to our own commodity analysts as well as to farmers. Weather forecasting is, of course, the province of the Department of Commerce. USDA has never taken a sufficiently deep interest in analyzing the effects of weather on production, and this should be corrected.

Not that we can control weather; there is still much to be done in learning to forecast it accurately. But we need to crank weather knowledge and information into the models that are designed to predict what may happen in terms of both planted acreage and final crop output. Predictions based on averages are of little value to anyone. We need to do this in our estimates of situations in other countries as well as in our own.

The second consideration so important to future policy judgments is the recognition that "global agriculture" is now much more than just a phrase. The American farmer is inseparable from the international food complex, where a farm work force of 900 million produces for a world population of 4 billion; where 150 nations trade in 2,000 farm commodities; where new ideas are shared by satellite, yet primitive farming is common; and where incomes generally are rising, yet people are still hungry. For thousands of years, agricultural economies were local, national or, at most, continental. Certainly, that is no longer true. Events of this decade have demonstrated most forcefully that American farmers and consumers are intimately affected by a fishing failure off South America, a grain shortfall in the Soviet Union, a freeze in Brazil, or a monsoon failure in southern Asia. Interdependence with other nations is a fact American farmers must deal with every day.

The United States is the largest food exporter in the world, accounting for half the world's grain trade and two-thirds of its soybean trade. We are the second largest importer of farm products, and the world's largest provider of food aid. Foreign markets each year take the products from 100 million acres of U.S. cropland—almost one barbed wire acre in three. Exports provide directly for one-fifth of U.S. gross farm income—and indirectly affect our agriculture much more through their impact on the general level of farm prices. Because of this, swings in world production too often have contributed to sharp up and down in our farm economy—a "boom and bust" syndrome that we must try to even out.

Increased attention to world weather and to our international food position will place new challenges before the Department of Agriculture. Many of these challenges are not fully defined; nevertheless, certain things are increasingly clear as we look at the future in four areas of international interest:

Market Expansion
We must do everything we can to maintain and expand U.S. agriculture's overseas markets. The ability of the United States to produce—especially grains, soybeans, cotton, and many other crops—is such that large overseas sales are now built into the marketing structure. For example, in most years in the United States we use roughly 20 million metric tons of wheat—for all purposes. That level is relatively constant. Yet in 1976, we produced a wheat crop almost three times that large. Even if we export 28.5 million tons this year, we will still have a U.S. carryover approaching 80 million tons next June 1.

Our wheat farmers must export, and this is true of producers of most of our major crops and for many specialty crops as well. Moreover, there is a growing need for food—(CONT. ON PAGE 19)

Reyes, Reyes, & Elder Auctioneering & Sale Management Services is to manage "East Texas Simmental Association Sale." Wayne Stoval, president of the East Texas Simmental Association, has announced that Reyes & Elder will manage and auctioneer the First Premier Simmental Sale sponsored by the East Texas Simmental Association. National Simmental Sale will be held on October 15.

Importation of this purebred Simmental bull, photographed on the Manitoba-North Dakota border, was one of the keys in qualifying the breed for duty-free importation from Canada. At the request of American Simmental Association, purchasers John and Darlene May, well, Valparaiso, Indiana, refused to pay the import duty since the bull was a purebred and was being imported for seedstock. These sturdy panels can be taken right to your pasture and in less than 15 minutes, 20 of these rugged panels can be set up by two men. A corral this size will handle over 100 head of cattle. Now the entire outer frame is made of rugged 1-5/8 inch structural steel pipe. All other horizontal rails are made of heavy weight 1-1/8 inch structural steel pipe. Two vertical braces of strong steel pipe are welded to pipe rails at every cross-over point. Stronger than steel yet lighter to move. Every corral panel is fitted with dual pin at one end and double pipe sockets at the other. Makes it easy to set up corral by merely hooking the pins of the second panel into the pipe sockets of the first. Top pin is longer than the bottom one so the panel can be easily lined up and bottom drops right in. Double pipe socket makes it easy to set up in a Y or T shape. TEXAS SHORTHORN NEWS

Walter E. Peterson Honored for Dedication To Shorthorn Breed

BY MARY HINTON

Walter E. Peterson of Justin was honored during the Southwestern Exposition and Fat Stock Show in Ft. Worth by the Texas Shorthorn Association for his many years of dedication to the Shorthorn breed of cattle. Peterson has been associated with Shorthorn cattle for all of his 82 years and raising them for 68 years. His father raised the dual-purpose Durhams, but Peterson wasn't interested in milking cows, so in 1908 he bought ten cows from the Smoot herd near Argyle and started in the beef business. He and his brother, Rudolph Peterson, were partners in the farming operation until Rudolph's death a few years ago.

When asked about Shorthorns and North Central Texas area, Peterson starts explaining about the geographic conditions. He points out the elements in the soil which make the land suitable for farming and ranching. Back in the 1800's the land attracted people, and the Shorthorn breed of cattle was most suited to the operations of many settlers because of their milking ability in addition to their ease in fleshing and beefness. Shorthorns came to the North Texas area in the 1800's. Peterson still has the pedigrees of some of his early purchases which were hand written in longhand.

By 1918 the Peterson herd had grown enough to produce show cattle for every class of females at the Fort Worth Show. During that time more aged animals were shown, including cow and calf pairs. Peterson traveled widely on the show cattle circuit. He recalls competing against such breeders as the Dicks, Murphys, Campbells, Raynolds, Doss Miller and Frank Scofield. In 1924, Peterson was in charge of a Shorthorn exhibit to Mexico. While in Mexico City he sold a calf for $280.00. At that time all traveling to shows was done in railroad cars.

Peterson had been in the business 6 or 7 years when World War I began. He notes that changes in living and eating habits have occurred after every major war. Before the war, a man from Illinois, Frank Hastings had begun a baby beef feeding operation. In 1920, Peterson started working with John Burns, a cattle consultant in Fort Worth. They forecast changes in the cattle industry, and were concerned by the cattlemen stock-piling their cattle. Some producers would feed cattle over a year before selling.

Peterson notes that change is hardest for the older breeders. About 1925, he started feeding cattle in summer and finishing them out by Christmas. His cows calved in the fall, the calves weaned in June and were on feed until Christmas. His policy was to sell calves early if he ran out of feed. He would call the Fort Worth stock yards about a week before he took the calves to market. The calves would be haltered and look pretty. His hanked on homesteaders being tired of turkey after Thanksgiving and Christmas, and ready to buy beef. Even during the depression, the program continued to be profitable. Peterson believed in having money at Christmas, paying his bills at the end of the year, and starting a new year with some money. After about forty years his program changed to marketing the bulk of the calves in August and September, and the rest in December. He says the main thing to watch in feeding the cattle is long and letting them get overly finished.

At 82 years old, Walter Peterson is still interested in the farming and ranching business. He has seen most of his early competitors close the doors on their operations. Yet he seldom misses the state Shorthorn sale or the State Fair or Fort Worth Livestock Show. He and Mrs. Peterson still live on their farm on the outskirts of Justin. He runs about 60 mother cows, some sheep, and raises peacocks. He maintains that a diversi-
